Now Eton
joins the Embassy set

In a cheeky recruiting drive London's Embassy Club - well noted for its gay clientele - is plucking new members from the playing fields of Eton and Harrow.

This is not to say that the lads who are signing up are any anything but the husky variety, but nevertheless the £5-a-head campaign is well under way. So well that the Embassy is set to launch its new junior section, "Fourteen Plus - Minus Eighteen", in a months time.

David Inches, general manager of the Embassy, where the waiters prance round the tables in satin shorts and where men wear make-up and have been known to dance cheek-to-cheek confirms: "The junior section committee is formed of boys from these two schools."

The club's founder and co-director, kipper-tie inventor Michael Fish, adds: "We find that there are so many kids with nowhere to go. We plan to have an opening party next month."

At £2,500-a-year Harrow the recruiting is being carried out by an enterprising pupil named Graham Hill.

Another Harrovian vigorously extolling the virtues of the Embassy Club is Cary Elwes, livewire 16 year old son of the late Dominic Elwes, artist and one time friend of the fugitive Lord Lucan.

Cary says: "I am aware that the Embassy Club has a gay reputation but I'm happy to be a committee member and will be taking my girl friend."

So far 100 members have been recruited from the two schools. Last night Harrow's headmaster Brian Hoban said: "Here is it customary that my permission be sought first for recruitment of
